- Document A -

This cartoon, entitled “Freedom in the Congo”, was published in Deutsche Zeitung, a German newspaper, on 16 July 1960. It comments on tensions between Belgians and Congolese in the newly-independent Democratic Republic of the Congo.

- Document B -

The following is an edited extract from an article in TIME, an American news magazine, in which a journalist reports from the Congo. It was published on 25 July 1960.

Belgium moved swiftly in response to its beleaguered citizens in the Congo. Paratroopers were rushed there from Belgium. They were expected to display an iron discipline, in contrast with the disorderly behaviour of the mutinous troops of the Congolese army, the Force Publique. But the paratroopers soon got out of hand.

Storming their way into Leopoldville, after capturing the airport, they beat up any Africans they encountered, disarming and arresting Congolese troops. When the Congo foreign minister proposed a truce – with joint patrols, to police Leopoldville – the paratroopers indignantly refused to sit beside ‘those black apes’ in military jeeps. They were trigger-happy and arrogant.

When Prime Minister Lumumba returned to Leopoldville and got into a bus for the ride into the city, paratroopers rocked the bus so violently that they raised it off the ground. One of them shouted: ‘We ought to have shot this bastard full of holes’. TIME correspondent Lee Griggs was shot at by a paratrooper, who then apologised because ‘in the dark I thought you were an African’.
